The Social Determinants of Health (SDoH), like those represented above, impact up to 80% of a person's overall health and well-being, impacting students' ability to stay focused and learn at school. These determinants affect how a person shows up to school; mentally, physically, and emotionally.

Our services are specifically built around meeting your students where they're at, providing custom solutions to their unique life needs and challenges. Because when your student body is healthy and thriving, so is your institution.

OUR APPROACH

HOW WE DO IT

There's no one-size-fits-all program. We utilize our network, relationships, and local community partnerships to find the best care pathways for your student body based on our findings. Our methods are based on connection. Because of this, our resources and interventions are constantly evolving, growing, and adapting.

How does student well-being impact your institutional health?

Declining student retention and graduation rates not only impact students, but they directly impact and damage the institution's long-term reputation, student enrollment, and income stream.

Through our student programs, we assist universities and colleges in identifying the main basic human life needs in their student population and partner with them to develop proactive interventions to address those needs. We then help track the impact of those actions to determine the ROI and adjust as necessary.
